I've been thinking about this lately, as I've been considering whether to seek a new job. My concern is that I've been in the same position in the past, where I've always been among the lowest paid and longest hours in the entire department. Now I'm at a new job and am the only non-supervisor working the same hours as everyone else. Is it reasonable for me to expect the same pay, the same bonus, the same stock options, the same sense of importance and contribution? I know this is a question that could be argued both ways, but does anyone have any insight or personal experience that may illuminate the situation? A: It depends, it depends. This is the question that I'm most interested in when I interview candidates: how does someone deal with stress? And for your question, stress could be time, stress could be money, stress could be people, and stress could be working conditions (which is what you might find if you're asking a question like this over email). One thing I'd suggest is that you talk to the people that work there and try to find out more about the "stress" of working there. Does your manager tell you that they never have enough people, so they have to work long hours? That they had to pull someone off of a large project due to sickness and had to work longer hours? How about overtime pay? How are they compensated? How are you compensated? I would suggest that you not ask these questions directly, but in order to understand how it works, you have to understand what the job entails and the job of that position. A: The other answers so far are focusing on the "longest hours" part. But really the question is: "Are the hours long enough to earn decent compensation?".
