Agisoft Metashape Professional Version: 1.5.2Jungian psychology and nursing: a coda. The purpose of this coda is to illustrate Jung's understanding of the nature of the "psychology" (or "conscience") in psychological and somatic symptoms, as a means of emphasizing and elucidating more fully how the ideas of the depth psychology and of the psychosomatic theories are to be applied to the practice of nursing. In particular, attention is drawn to Jung's original contributions to our understanding of the nature of psychological symptoms (attention is in particular drawn to the notions of introverted and extroverted personality and to the concept of disassociation) and of the nature of "psychological life" and "psychic structure" (the notion of "feeling tone").Friday, April 29, 2011 This week we covered a fair amount of ground, not only in our discussion of how to prevent bacterial infections, but also learning a great deal about the hepatitis virus. A quick refresher on how viruses work is in order before we move on, however. It's important to know that viruses are not just the cause of a simple cold or flu. No, viruses cause all sorts of diseases, including childhood ear infections, chicken pox, pneumonia, autoimmune disorders such as rheumatoid arthritis and even cancer. The reason for this seemingly wide-spread infectiousness of viruses is that they are alive, unlike bacteria which are dead. A virus is actually a part of the cell that duplicates and causes destruction to the host cell. So, when
