The computer programming for visualizing movies, which has made it possible for millions of people to go back to the movies, is about to be launched with a big bang. HO:TRIVIA. Some of you may know that I have a slight obsession with Golden Age Hindi Cinema, especially the 1950s, and I'm quite possibly the only person I know who's more interested in the latter half of this era than the former. The following entries are either brief reviews of books, movies or software packages, or short articles about them. Some are plain old Trivia, others are reviews of films, books, etc. Is it possible that our interest in the Hindi movies of the Golden Age of the 1950s has produced this amazing renaissance of classic Hindi movies? You don't believe that, do you? I don't either. But you can see it happen before your very eyes, just as I did. HIMALAYAN AND SALVATION. I've often wondered about that. What were they thinking? On paper, a movie based on a real life incident, with genuine, real-life characters and dialogue should have been a sure-fire hit, especially in India. It would be different for the movies based on contemporary novels. Novels have to be all-in-one film — screenplay, dialogue, characters, dialogue, direction, cinematography. Some of them fail miserably, even with the best director in the world. Movies based on real life, whether it's an incident or an actual event, are supposed to be more successful. But this one, I don't think it was ever supposed to be a success. In the 1950s, the screenwriters of India didn't think in terms of computer programming for visualizing movies. All they could think about was the action story. They would send in a synopsis and the director would go through it and the first few lines of each scene, from the beginning to the end, and decide if he liked it or not. Then he'd be off to the next scene, and the next one and the next one and the next one. And when they were all done, the last scene would be the most important scene of all. The director would want that one to be extra big, extra special, extra exciting. At times, the action would be so big, so shocking, the villain so evil, that it
