Fewer Americans are "very suspicious" of Clinton (47 percent) than Trump (54 percent), and the number of people who are only "slightly suspicious" of Clinton (39 percent) is smaller than Trump's (48 percent). Among Trump's strongest supporters, 53 percent say they are only "slightly suspicious" of Clinton, and just 10 percent are "very suspicious." That compares to 80 percent of Clinton's strongest supporters who are "deeply suspicious" of Trump and 72 percent who are only "slightly suspicious." The poll comes at a time of an FBI investigation into allegations of emails on Clinton's private server, and just hours after a new poll out Tuesday found that 70 percent of voters consider the email issue a "major factor" in their vote. The poll also finds a majority of Americans consider Trump too impulsive for president. More than two-thirds of Americans — 69 percent — said they think Trump isn't making good decisions for the country. The poll, conducted online from Sept. 12 to 14, surveyed 1,990 registered voters and has a margin of error of plus or minus 2 percentage points.
