Loftek Nexus 543 IP Camera: Review: A Smart Surveillance Network Camera. | The GOP, if it ever recovers from the awful defeat of 2008, will have to learn the lessons of the fall. One of the biggest was that being liberal and support for liberal causes are not mutually exclusive. People who support Big Government interventions in the economy and its cultural programs often have good intentions, but if the economy is bad they can't blame the business or banking system but themselves. But the lesson of the fall goes beyond economics, into the culture. Today's Republicans are the heirs to a good portion of the Western intellectual tradition -- Judeo-Christianity, economics, and even, to some extent, the classics -- but they are surrounded by cultural liberals. Some of them are a generation or two older, and they've seen their grandchildren blown away in a culture war. These people don't come from a culture that has much respect for people who think differently. The nature of our culture war -- which is one with mostly children -- is that it is a culture war with no respect for truth. In the fall of 2008 there was an honest attempt to discredit the messenger and not the message. So let's be clear: If someone uses the term "liberal" and is blaming the entire country's woes on Bush, that is not liberalism, it is left-wing radicalism. Our children have taken the right's assertions about the evils of modern liberalism as gospel truth, but to a large number of them, the Republican leadership is that of radicalism -- and they are too young to know any better. If the Republican Party's problem is that young people are left of center, not right of center, as some of the self-professed moderates on the conservative side maintain, then we need to do more to rebuild the culture, not less. What is the point of holding a national meeting at the Republican National Convention, for example, if the largest bloc of delegates is going to be young people who have no respect for the tradition from which they came? If the GOP meets the youth with scorn
