My roommate says there is no difference between a candy bar and a savory food: there is only the chemistry of the sugar. I say to him that you cannot survive by only with savory food. Should I argue with him? A: He is right in that you cannot survive without some sugars. There is a difference between an apple, which is high in sugar, and a candy bar. The sugar in the candy bar is not vitally important, and it isn't the sugar that I or my body consumes, it's the calorie content that matters. It is much easier to obtain the necessary caloric intake from a candy bar than from a piece of fruit. If you did, it would be more difficult to survive. A: Sugar isn't really the main issue. You need food. Candy bars are calorie dense and you would get fatter eating them. Inulin and FOS are the interesting molecules. They don't cause the problems you might think. FOS were originally thought to be primarily responsible for stomach effects of indigestion because they are tolerated in high amounts in salad dressings. Instead, studies have shown that FOS are actually helpful for weight loss: they stimulate the microbiome in the intestines to produce SCFA (short chain fatty acids) which helps the body metabolise food and thus causes weight loss. Inulin is somewhat different and, in my experience, it is rather unpopular. It acts as prebiotic, which means it helps the microbiome and thus helps the host weight loss, but at high doses (e.g. 5%) it can cause mild gastrointestinal discomfort. You are the best judge whether they have side effects if you are using them as a part of the basis of your diet. If you are trying to gain weight, you may want to avoid them to see if that is an issue. Q: remove if is true I have this method where I am receiving a different object depending on the user. In the method I am checking if a flag is true and then depending on that I am removing an object. I have no idea what I am doing wrong here. public boolean clear ba244e880a
