. But it becomes acceptable that the assassin and the public knew about her pregnancy. However, it was not acceptable that it was through a public romance. Hence, although the public viewed the pregnancy as normal and unobjectionable, it was clear that what happened was not! Example 2: My mother got married at the age of 17. My brother and I would see her and my dad, share stories, and say happy birthday to my older brother and sister. During the summer vacation when she was about 18, she announced she was pregnant. That made me heartily upset. But I didn't get mad at her! She was so young, and she just wanted to move out of her parents house and get married. The pregnancy was just a part of it, and I was not angry at her. Example 3: This is a personal example. I grew up in a culture where we think telling people something like this is normal, and you have to tell everyone you meet. Example 4: I was attacked in a park one night when I was about 3 months pregnant. My ex-husband was there with the baby. After the attack, he and I stared at each other and at the baby. I cried as much as I could, and he was very upset. He didn't say a word. When the police arrived, they asked us to show them the area where it happened, because they didn't see it, and we could point to it. They asked if we saw anyone who could have done it. When my ex-husband said he didn't see anyone, they started to get very suspicious of him, but they decided that his story was pretty believable, and that it seemed as if we had been attacked by a stranger. I was very upset at this point, because it really seemed like he had been protecting me rather than protecting himself. But when we were discussing it, I understood it was not that way. He was just protecting himself. Example 5: On June 6, 2011, my husband and I were at the grocery store with two young children. We ran into a couple of people that we knew. Two of the women we knew, d4474df7b8
